

TOPIC

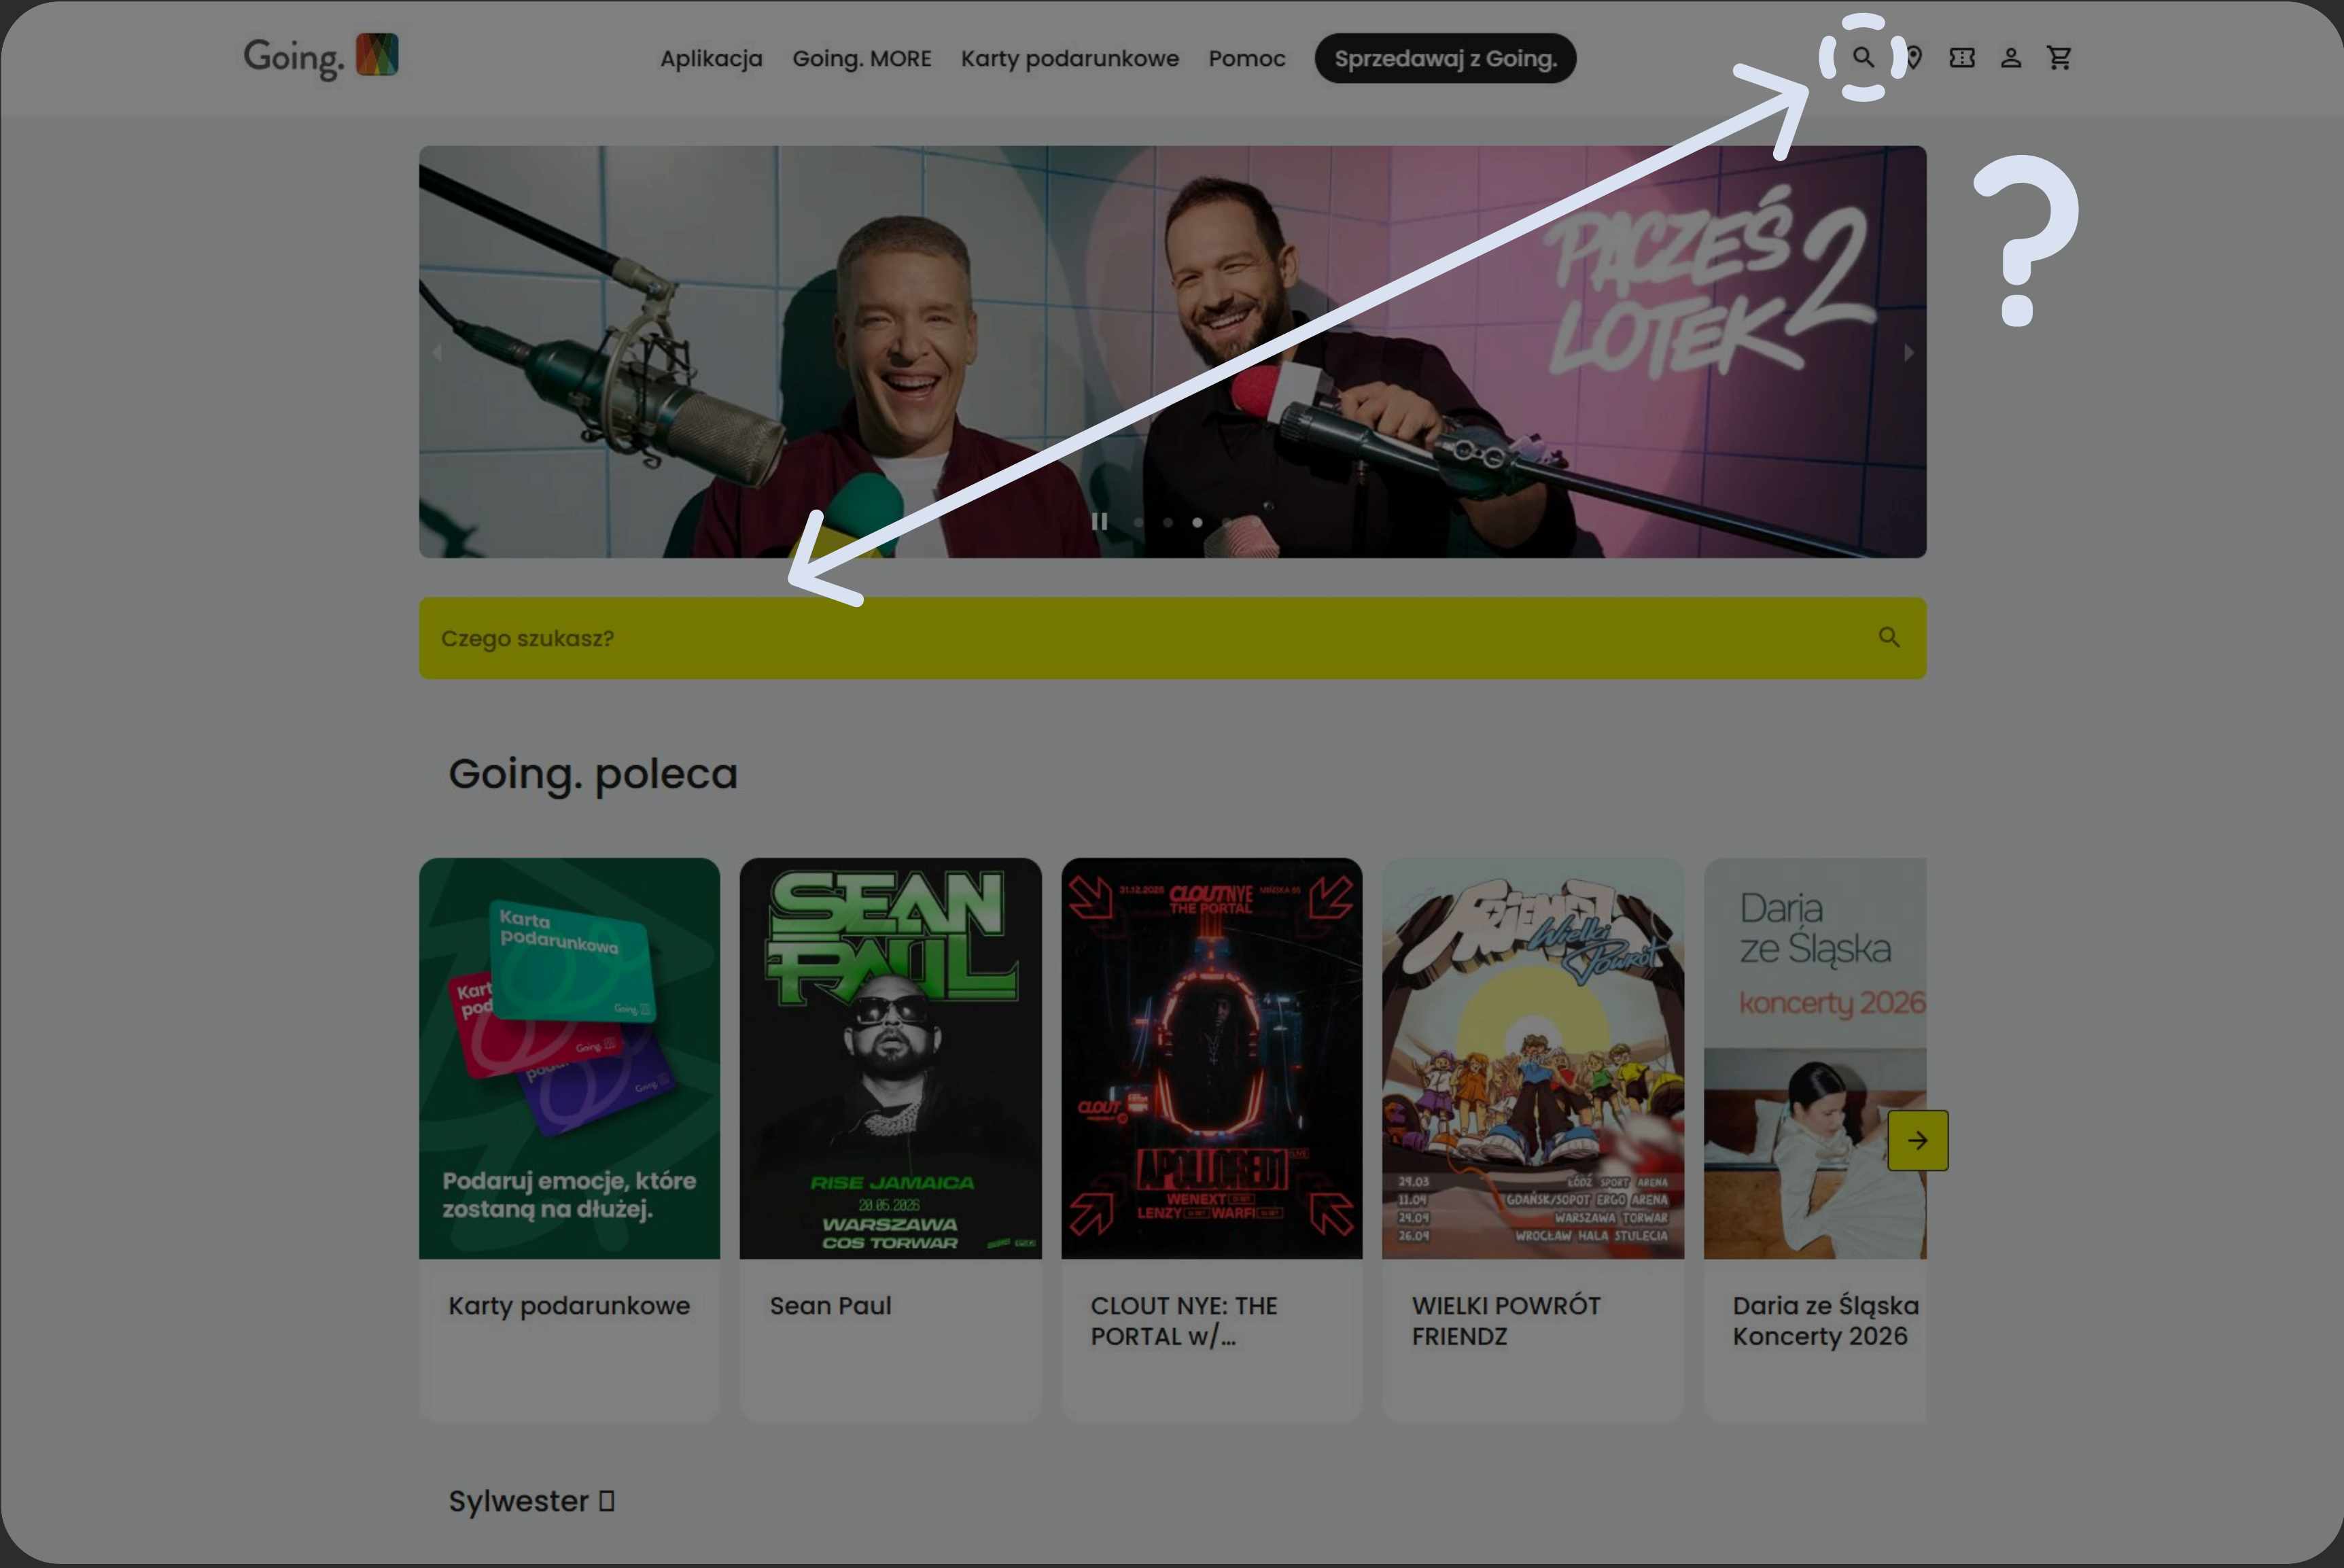

Oversimplified interface which makes the user waste too much time on finding something that is actually supposed to make this process easier.

PROBLEM

Hidden event options like: type, date, city, tags, etc.
Only when we find small magnifier/search icon in the top right corner, we get redirected to the actual full searching page. Then we can finally choose from said options.

Even if this happens for first visits and we get used to it, the new users are the most important. This is the type of group we need to attract to make them come back.

In the best-case scenario the user will find the button and desired event, but there could be also a bad scenario where user would not achieve that and would rather leave the page.

SOLUTION

I placed a list of buttons below the event search box on the home page. The list contains three drop-down lists, followed by “quick” tags. Highlighting drop-down lists to avoid confusion with tags.

I’ve tried to match with the websites own aesthetics by applying highly saturated shade of blue, contrasting with yellow.

Just imagine a situation where a user simply wants to check for metal concerts. This would require only one click instead of two (skipping the main problem).

This solution is temporary and aims to illustrate the solution in a simple and intuitive way.

